Truck driver fatigue is a critical issue in the transportation industry. It poses significant risks to drivers, other road users, and the overall safety of the highways. Hours-of-Service (HOS) regulations are designed to mitigate these risks. However, violations of these regulations are common and can lead to severe legal consequences.

The Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration (FMCSA) sets national standards for HOS. These regulations dictate how long a driver can operate a vehicle and the required rest periods. For example, drivers must take a 30-minute break after 8 hours of driving. They are also limited to 11 hours of driving after 10 consecutive hours off duty.

While federal regulations provide a baseline, states may impose stricter rules. Some states have additional requirements regarding rest periods or driving hours.
